Mokume-Gane

Traditionally Mokume-Gane translates as 'wood grain metal'. The typical composition of Mokume-Gane sheets is gold, copper, silver, bronze and brass. It involves the use of at least two different metals or alloys compatible on their properties of ductility and malleability, and develops a pattern like wood grain in metal laminate as a result of diffusion, the bonding of two layers, without the use of solder or flux. The technique was originally developed in Japan by Denbei Shoami (1651-1728) for decoration on swords. Recently, the method has grown in popularity and interest in the west, especially in America where Universities have been researching into old and developing new techniques.

Mokume-Gane

by Ian Ferguson

In this practical handbook, Ian Ferguson looks at the history of the technique of Mokume-Gane, discusses the materials, equipment and technical information needed for the process. He discusses the great challenge involved in using the process and celebrates the fact that each piece of work is unique. Soft bound , 128 pages

THE HERTFORDSHIRE SCHOOL OF JEWELLERY (HSJ), which offers workshops and courses for beginners and expert jewellers alike, is currently working alongside the NVQ to gain the accreditation of becoming the first ever nationally recognised qualification for Metal Clay. The qualification covers all types of metal clay including: PMC, Art Clay, Copper Clay plus many others. The workshops are run by Jewellery artist and designer Joanna Mason who has over 5 years of professional experience.

There are no other courses quite like this of its kind with the HSJ striving to be at the forefront of the Jewellery education. The accreditation will be free from association with marketing or any particular brand of clay. If you want to teach classes or work seriously with Metal Clay then this will be the most thorough training you can get anywhere in the world.

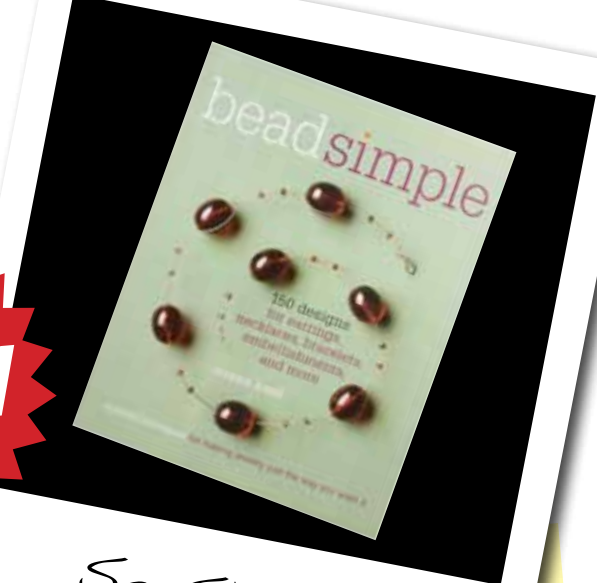

Don't forget, Cookson are official stockists of Metal Clay, with huge stocks of PMC and Art Clay Silver products, plus with the recent introduction of Copper Clay it makes us the most comprehensive retailer for your metal clay needs. Visit us online or call our contact centre to order.
